MISSISSIPPPS NEW CONSTITUTION Construction of a Document That

Unique in Many Respects. The new constitution of Mississippi, primarily designed to maintain the political supremacy of the Bourbon Democracy, possesses some novel featares. The convention did not submit the document to the people for ratifica-tion, but it was declared absolutely to be the law, a method of making consti-tutions unknown to Northern commonwealths. The new organic act abolishes slavery, though in this case nothing was done except to wipe the relics of the institution from the statute books. It is de-clared that Mississippi shall never again attempt to withdraw from the Union; persons engaging in dueling, either as rincipal or second, are disfranchised; otteries are prohibited; non-sectarian schools are provided for, and the leasing of convict labor to corporations is for-

Under one article the Australian ballot system goes into effect on January 1, 1891, but the Legislature is empowered to abolish it after five years if it proves unsuccessful. Every elector must pay a poll-tax of $2 and must exhibit his receipt at the polls before voting. He must be able to read a section of the new Constitution, or give a reasonable "in-terpretation" of what the section means when it is read to him. No definition of what a "reasonable interpretation" is given, hence the power to accept or reject votes is placed absolutely in the hands of the election officers. General Lee, who carried the order to open fire on Fort Sumter twenty-nine years ago, was a member of the convention. When an attempt was made to defeat the sec-tion which declares Mississippi to be an inseparable part of an indissolu-ble Union, Lee told the dele-gates that he had emerged from the war convinced that secession was not only impracticable, but wrong, and he hoped Mississippi would declare for-ever against it. He believed, moreover, that every man engaged in the rebellion shared his conviction.

The Brooklyn, N. Y., police census returns show a population of 855,000; the federal census made it 808,000.
